The History of the Chesterfield Mayfair

The Chesterfield Hotel, located in the heart of Mayfair has a rich and varied history. Just off Berkeley Square, Charles Street was part of the land holding owned by Lord Berkeley. The street was named after King Charles I. The street was constructed between 1745-1750 by John Phillips, whose workshop, with access between floors provided only by rope ladders, survived well into the last century.

The area has always been known as “the abode of rank and fashion” and the three former private residences, numbers 34-36, which make up the Chesterfield, have known numerous wealthy, aristocratic and interesting occupants. Number 34 was occupied by the Christian Socialist Edward Vansittart Neale, the agriculturist Colonel Sir Robert FitzHardinge Kingscote and more recently the Burrell Hoffman family of New York.

The most distinguished occupant of number 35 in the 1830s was Francis Jeffrey, who lived there while serving as Lord Advocate of Scotland. Lord Jeffrey, a Scottish judge and literary critic, was a staunch friend to “men of letters”. He loaned Thomas Carlyle money at a critical moment, sent money to the destitute Hazlitt as he lay on his deathbed, formed a friendship with Charles Dickens and edited Macaulays famous history. Other occupants included Sir George Duckworth and Martin de Selincourt, chairman of the Swan & Edgar department store.

From about 1812 until 1846, no 36 was occupied by David Stewart Ker, MP and from 1893 was in the possession of Beresford Valentine Melville, MP. In 1898, it is listed as housing the Countess of Carnarvon. Records are not clear but this is either the wife of the co-discoverer in 1922 of the Tomb of Tutankhamun, or his stepmother. She was replaced by Captain the Hon. Henry Denison who was later replaced in the 1920's by Sir Connop Guthrie.

By 1943 all three houses had been joined together to form annexes for the English Speaking Union. The Hotel still has access from its corridors into the Union today. Over 250 years after the sounds of Charles Street being built first rang out, The Chesterfield Hotel, named after Lord Chesterfield who owned most of Mayfair in the 1800's, opened its doors on 29th April 1973. It has since become one of London's most prestigious superior four star hotels, offering every modern convenience for the business and leisure guest but retaining the elegance and ambience of its historic English past.
